Rarely would a book be the product of only one person. This is particularly the case with this book, Prospects for a Security Community in Southern Africa. The nature of the subject matter demanded long hours, days, weeks, months and even years of exhaustive research; an undertaking that required a great deal of assistance from a number of institutions. Among the people responsible for this book are my editors, Prof. Lisa Thompson, Director of the Centre for Southern African Studies (CSAS) at the University of the Western Cape; Elizabeth le Roux, Director of Publications at the Africa Institute for South Africa (AISA); and Major General (retired) Len le Roux, Programme Head of the Defence Sector Programme at the Institute for Security Studies. Others include Prof. Axel Hadenius and Dr Mats Lundstrom of the Department of Government at Uppsala University. My wife, Gertrude, without whose help and understanding the book project would not have been possible, must also be mentioned.

Special mention ought to be made of the Institute for Security Studies for its decision to accept the book project as a worthwhile endeavour in the area of regional security, the School of Government at the University of the Western Cape, and the Department of Government at Uppsala University for their logistical support which enabled the book manuscript to become a reality.

I reserve special gratitude to the Austrian government, through its embassy in Pretoria, for being the first to provide financial support for the actual production of the book. With this gesture, the Austrian government registered its interest in the peace and stability of the states and peoples of Southern Africa. In the same vein, the financial assistance from UNESCO reflects the seriousness the world body attaches to issues of regional security.
